Formed by Dr. M. Bradley Calobrace, CaloAesthetics Plastic Surgery Center sits at the vanguard of plastic surgery in the Louisville and Lexington area. "Our emphasis is the highest level of patient safety, providing our patients with the information to make the right choices for their situation, surrounding our patients with an experienced, well-trained staff and offering advanced surgical skill," says Dr. Calobrace. "Enthusiastic patients tell their friends about us, and physicians around the country refer patients to us, especially in complex situations."

In 2016, the board-certified Dr. Chet Mays joined the Calobrace team, bringing his tremendous experience, natural skill, aptitude, and a remarkable sense of empathetic sensitivity with him. He has an emotional intelligence about him that just can't be taught. "When someone comes to see us for a consultation, they're really opening up about something that they aren't comfortable with about themselves and putting themselves in a vulnerable position," Dr. Mays says. "This is a decision that I don't take lightly, and it's of the utmost importance that everyone feels more than comfortable here."

Dr. Mays comes from a family with particularly skilled hands. His father and three older brothers are also surgeons. He considers himself not only a surgeon but an artist. "What we do at CaloAesthetics is essentially sculpting, molding, and shaping, only instead of clay, it's the human body. What we do is 100% committed to the cosmetic and aesthetic, so in a way, this is our art studio."

CaloAesthetics is a place that reflects the desires of our own self-image, where those problem areas that the gym just doesn't seem to fix or the signs of aging can be modified or reshaped into something more to our liking. Dr. Mays puts it succinctly; "We're here to help you love the body you're in."
